Examining Some of the Many Causes of Arthritis

In my research on Arthritis I notice that “calcium” build up in the arthritis is listed as a major cause of arthritis. Nature calcium from nature foods should not cause a build up of calcium in the arteries. Over the past months, and in reading labels of many food items, I noticed that all sorts of calcium from chemical sources are now being used in food preparations, and in the processing of white cane sugar, and in table salt. Chemical, industrial calcium should never be used in any way in the processing of any type of food item; such as, calcium hydrate is now being used in the processing of some brands of white cane sugar; and calcium silicate is now being used in the processing of some brands of certain table salts. Secondly, different types of calcium from various sources are now being used in various food items, especially to promote the adding of calcium as being beneficial to the food items.

I do have great concerns about the chemical, industrial calcium that is being used now in the processing of different food items, and I would like to know if these chemical, industrial calcium sources are clogging the arteries of many people. Also, I have great concerns about the various other types of calcium that are now being used in foods, and in calcium supplements, even calcium from ground-up rocks. Again, nature calcium from nature food should never clog the arteries. There are definite reasons why there is a build up of calcium in the arteries of many men and women. Research must be done, especially because it seems that there are many men and women who are now experiencing arthritis, and are having problems walking, even at an early age.
